

JUST when tensions had started easing among the cast of "Grey's Anatomy," news that actress Kate Walsh was getting her own spinoff show has caused more bad blood on the set.

"Everyone feels blindsided," a source told The ENQUIRER.

"Kate was in secret talks for weeks with the brass and never said a word to anyone" that she was getting her own show.

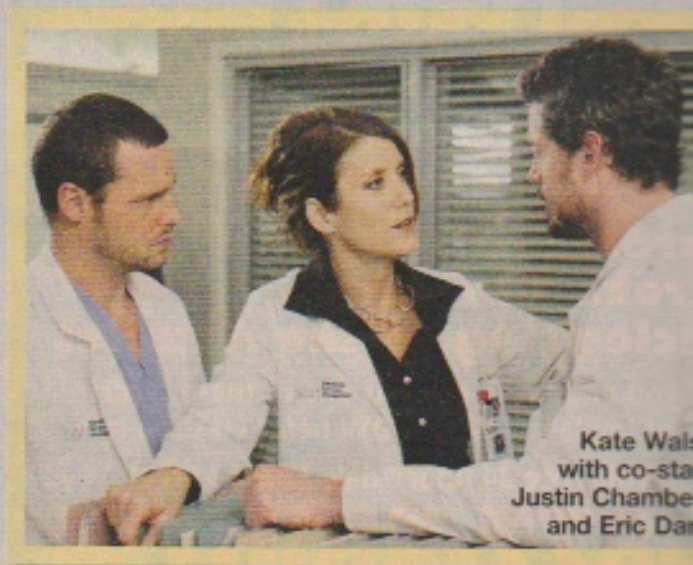

The troubled cast of the hit ABC medical drama has been working to end the hostility that erupted last fall when Isaiah Washington directed a gay slur at co-star T.R. Knight, a story first reported by The ENQUIRER.

As the "star" of "Grey's," Ellen Pompeo feels she should have been consulted, while Patrick Dempsey, Eric Dane and Justin Chambers "all have separate axes to grind," the source said.

"Each cast member thought they'd be the one chosen," added an ABC insider.

"It seems like everyone feels their character is the most important and now Kate's getting the shoulder."
